Some of the sheep growers have been holding conventions and passing resolutions against the proposition to abolish or lessen the tax on wool. They have resolved that the tariff of 1883 reduced the number of sheep in the country to 6,000,000, and the price of wool one half, and produced such a panie that herds were turned loose as no longer profstable. Coleman's Rural World attributes the decrease in the number of sheep to the severe winter in the West and Southwest of late years in which more than 50 per cent of many large herds froze to death, and then gives a tabular statement of the number of sheep reported in Iowa in 1867, when the highest protective tariff was placed on wool at 1,354,698, which decreased annually under that policy till 1883, when there were only 401,429
